The website will be supported by a Facebook page, which will be updated daily to provide information about facility development, services, and an opportunity to give feedback.

Facebook page and an abbreviated version of the full website went live last week, with the full version to launch by the end of the month.

The abbreviated website offers the community an opportunity to win a 12 month membership to the new facility.

Port Hedland mayor Kelly Howlett said both the website and the Facebook page would enable locals to stay abreast of all the latest developments at the centre.

"The centre will provide a really exciting and broad range of programs and recreation services to the Port Hedland community, and these services will be supported by a range of communication materials, including the new website and Facebook page," she said. "Our aim is to make sure all local residents have the tools to remain updated in regards to what's happening at the centre and we're certain that there will be something for everyone once our doors are open."
